The principle feature of this house is its juxtaposition of the two front gables giving an interesting variation of the Lutherville cottage. In addition to the unusual gable arrangement there is an odd assemblage of siding materials. Scalloped butt shingles fill the gables, horizontal clap boards are seen at the second floor level and board and batten siding is seen at the first floor level behind the one story front porch supported on turned columns.

Narrow three light windows, two in the main projecting gable and one in the secondary gable, are placed over wall space created by positioning the first and second floor windows, with their two over two sash hung with louvered blinds, near the outside edges of each gabled area. The front entrance with its six light transom is centered in elevation directly under the valley of the roof gables and is on the flat plane of the first floor wall.
